which mothing else can do, and which nothing can rob us of. All other advantages depend upon others as much as upon ourselves. Riches, power, and greatness may be taken away from us by the violence and injustice of others or by inevitable accidents, but Virtue depends only upon ourselves, and nobody can take it away from us. Sickness may deprive us of all the pleasure of the body: but it cannot deprive us of our virtue, nor of the satisfaction which we feel from it. A virtuous man, under all the misfortunes of life, still finds an inward comfort and satisfaction, which makes him happier than any wicked man can be, with all the other advantages of life. If a man has acquired great power and riches by falsehood, injustice, and oppression, he cannot enjoy them: because his conscience will torment him and constantly repreach him with the me'ns by which he got them. The stings of his sonscience will not even let him sleep quietly; but he will dream of his srimes; and in the day-time, when alone, and when he has time to think, he will be uneasy and melancholy. He is afraid of everything; for, as he knows mankind must hate him, he has reason to think they will hart him if they can. Thereas, if a virtuous man be ever so poor, or unfortunate in the world, still his virtue is its own reward, and will comfort him under all afflictions. The quiet and satisfaction of his conscience make him Thee ful by day, and sleep sound of nights; he can be alone with pleasure, and is not afraid of his own thoughts. Besides this, he is universally esteemed and respected; for even the most wicked people thomselves
